WALTON FAMILY
FOUNDATION

Creating Lasting Change

The philanthropic vision of Sam and Helen Walton has driven the work of the Walton Family Foundation for nearly three decades. Their legacy is more important than ever as we accelerate our efforts to improve K-12 education for all students in America, to protect our rivers and oceans and the communities they support, and to give back to the region that first gave Sam and Helen Walton opportunity.

A Message from the Executive Director

In my 15 years with the Walton Family Foundation, we've taken steps toward the vision that Sam and Helen Walton inspired – each year moving forward with greater urgency, but measured patience. The urgency to create immediate individual opportunity – for the kindergartener who needs and deserves a good school now, or for the fisherman whose livelihood depends on a healthy fish population today – and the patience to stay involved over decades to ensure broad opportunity for generations to come.

In 2015, our grantmaking totaled nearly $375 million, and we are poised to invest $2 billion over the next five years.

I've watched the work of our grantees change lives and communities for the better. Sleepy downtowns have become vibrant hearts of active cities. I've witnessed the preservation of entire ecosystems, while the livelihoods of people and communities were protected. And countless children have been given a greater chance to succeed in life because their families had access to high-quality educational options.

All of this was possible because the foundation staff and our board were eager to think — and act — big. I am humbled and proud of the work we've accomplished, but I know there is room to do more.

In our K-12 education program, we hold fast to our belief that access to a high-quality education can lead to a lifetime of opportunity and can be a path out of poverty. We know that good schools alone aren't enough; to truly make a difference, we need to cultivate leaders who embrace quality, communities that press for change and public policies that foster greatness in schools and classrooms.

In our environment program, by creating local economic incentives through the preservation of oceans, rivers and coasts, public and private partners are working together to develop long-term solutions that will benefit communities for generations to come.

The Walton family believes strongly in giving back to its home region, and that's never been more evident than now. In the Delta region of Arkansas and Mississippi, we increased after-school programming, and in Northwest Arkansas, we are supporting a new independent school, and we launched an initiative to elevate architectural and landscape design for public buildings and spaces — all of which will make our corner of the world a better place for residents today and those of tomorrow.

The children and grandchildren of Sam and Helen Walton who lead the foundation today have embraced and built upon their values and vision, and they continue carrying forward their legacy. We have set an ambitious course for the future that's built upon the strength of our past, and I'm optimistic about what's ahead.

Sincerely,

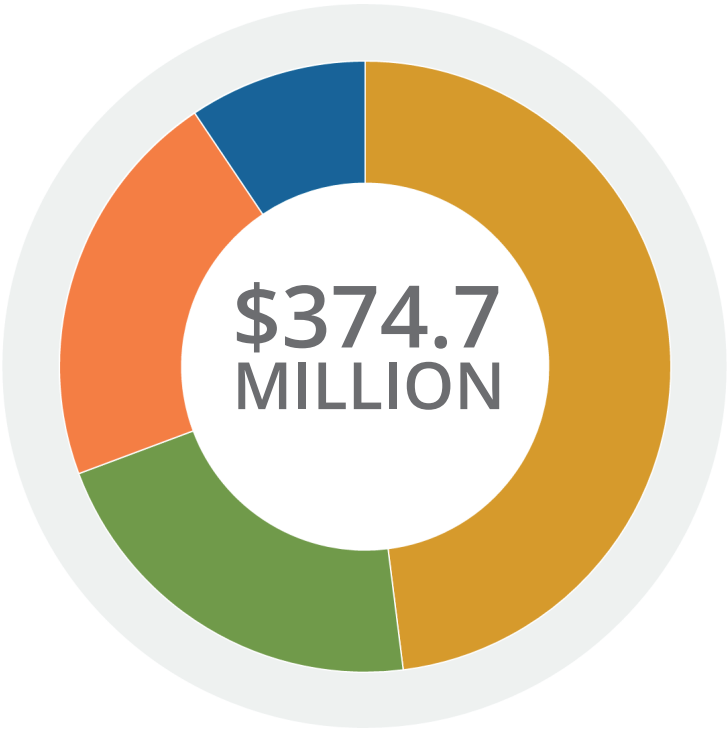

Buddy D. Philpot

“After nearly 30 years of family philanthropy, there are many lessons that apply to the future of the foundation. One of the most profound is the need to act with urgency – to create immediate individual opportunity – and patience – to stay involved to ensure broad opportunities for generations to come.”

K-12 Education

Creating opportunities for America's students

The Walton Family Foundation began supporting K-12 education in the mid 1990s, and we have learned that what initially seemed impossible – transforming the way the United States educates its most disadvantaged students – is achievable. Talented and passionate partners, teachers, school leaders and parents have shown that change, even of this magnitude, is possible.

In 2015, the foundation invested $179.9 million in education nationally, with $20 million of that taking the form of startup grants for 100 new charter schools in 13 cities across the country. The foundation has also worked to build a pipeline of talented principals and teachers, support community engagement and empowerment efforts, foster innovative ideas and research big questions that inform practice in the field.

With our new 2020 K-12 strategic plan, we are making an unprecedented commitment to expanding educational opportunity. We will focus our grantmaking in cities across the country — including Atlanta, Boston, Camden, Denver, Houston, Indianapolis, Los Angeles, Memphis, New Orleans, New York, Oakland, San Antonio and Washington, D.C.

We believe that creating high-quality school options and opportunities is important, but we also understand that to achieve long-lasting change, we must do more. That is why the foundation's five-year strategic plan includes:

- Investing in cities where conditions support systemwide educational improvement and where we can have the greatest impact;
- Supporting statewide and national efforts to develop environments receptive to autonomy, innovation and choice;
- Innovation in school models and new ways to advance long-term success for students; and
- Research and evaluation to understand how the efforts we support affect students, schools and educators.

We plan to invest $1 billion over five years to create more and better opportunities for America's children. These grants represent our investment in the future of communities — and in the ideas, approaches and education entrepreneurs who have a passion to serve and prepare the next generation of Americans to succeed in college, in jobs and in life.

Building Synergy between Charter and District Public Schools

LA charter uses recess rules and “Scholar Lessons” to bridge the gap

Hundreds of public charter schools across the country are co-located in school buildings with district schools. That’s normal.

What’s not normal is what’s happening at Synergy Academy in Los Angeles: students from co-located charter and district schools are playing together at recess, and teachers have joined up for shared professional development.

“We were specifically designed with the intent of not just serving the kids who come to our school,” said Meg Palisoc, the co-founder and CEO of Synergy Academy. “We always believed what we could do in a charter school could be replicated and transferred to a traditional district school... We really wanted to share.”

In 2013, Synergy was named the No. 1 charter elementary school in the state of California and the best urban elementary school in the United States. Synergy has expanded over time and is now a small network that also includes a middle and high school. In 2015, the high school, Synergy Quantum Academy, was named a Best High School by U.S. News & World Report and was featured in the Los Angeles Times as a “model school.” The Walton Family Foundation has supported Synergy with $1 million in grants since 2008. As Synergy has grown, it has been working to accomplish what it was created to do: share.

It shares with its neighbors. All three of the Synergy schools share space with district schools. Synergy’s elementary school has shared the recess practice — “Organized Play” — with its neighbor school, Quincy Jones, and all of the children use the method to play together at recess. At the middle school level, there’s a joint professional development between the three schools that share space on how to increase cooperative learning.

It also shares more broadly with educators in Los Angeles. Synergy has started hosting “Let’s Trade Secrets” workshops to share best practices and answer tough questions collaboratively with fellow educators. A session on Organized Play drew educators from LA Unified School District schools, charter schools and private schools.

“As former district teachers, we never saw it as ‘us vs. them,’” Meg said. “Charters are an opportunity for us as teachers to be able to have a school that is empowering for teachers, kids and families — and to get results and share.”

Transforming Low-Performing Schools in Memphis

Achievement School District cultivates talented leaders to improve struggling schools

Bobby White graduated from Frayser High School in Memphis in 1990. Last fall, he came back — not just as an alumnus, but as the school's leader.

In the time since White's graduation, the school had become "chaotic" and the students' achievement was suffering. The school was in the bottom 5% of schools in the state of Tennessee. It wasn't alone: 12 of the 14 schools in the neighborhood were in the bottom 5% of schools statewide.

"There needed to be a lightning bolt to kind of shock the school into a new state of thinking," White said. Because of its low performance, the school (now renamed Martin Luther King, Jr. Prep) had been designated as part of the Achievement School District (ASD) — a special district created in Tennessee to dramatically improve the bottom 5% of the state's schools. The goal of ASD is to create a great school in every neighborhood in Memphis. Cultivating talented leaders is one of the main ways the ASD transforms school cultures and results.

ASD leaders believe that Bobby has an opportunity to lead more than just a school, but also to build an organization in Frayser. Step one for success is finding great leaders and giving them a pathway to expand their leadership and their impact.

Community leaders estimate that in the next five years, Memphis charter schools, ASD schools and iZone schools will need to hire at least 3,000 new teachers and 130 new principals. Plans are in place in Memphis to attract and develop more than half of the needed talent.

A Q&A with Character Lab's Dr. Angela Duckworth

Taking a closer look at the notion of “grit” and the future of character research

Character strengths like curiosity, grit and optimism are skills that help students perform in school, college and life. The Walton Family Foundation is supporting Dr. Angela Duckworth, who popularized the notion of “grit” as an essential component of student success, and the Character Lab, which she founded with Dave Levin of KIPP and Dominic Randolph of the Riverdale Country School, to study innovative ways of teaching and assessing character.

What do we know about the relationship between students’ character and their academic performance?

Angela: Grit and self-control are tremendously powerful predictors of how well students of all socioeconomic backgrounds will do on everything from their report card grades to how often they’re going to get to class on time to whether they are going to graduate from high school or college, or, in fact, what they’re going to go on to do in terms of their professional success beyond school. And, of course, that’s the whole point of school, to put kids on the right path for life. It’s not an either/or. I think it’s a both/and. I think schools can absolutely encourage their students to develop character at the same time as they’re encouraging students to succeed academically, and if you do one, it should really help the other.

And what don’t we know yet? What are the top three questions you are trying to answer?

Angela: One major question — and maybe the most urgent one — is how do you increase character? The conversation on character development goes all the way back to Aristotle, and likely before. So, it’s not a new question.

What’s new is that we are trying to use the scientific method. In other words, we’re trying to ask and answer the question in a more systematic way. I think we’re really just at the beginning. We know very little right now about how to systematically cultivate things like gratitude and growth mindset, intellectual curiosity, grit, self-control, and so on. We’re learning, but these are the first steps of a long journey.

The second thing is measurement. You really can’t study anything and you can’t intervene in a systematic way if you can’t measure whether your program worked or didn’t work. For parents and educators, we want to create specific measures that provide useful feedback to children. Here’s an analogy: If a swimmer is trying to get faster, it’s really helpful to be able to look up at the clock and say, “That lap was one second faster than the last time.” We don’t have anything analogous so far for character. I think that’s an urgent priority.

The third question is: once we do figure out how to intervene in effective ways and how to measure character with precision and accuracy, how do we scale any of this?

How would we get this to the thousands of teachers and their many students in a way that is cost effective and high fidelity? That comes next after you solve the first two, but it’s on my mind already.

Protecting oceans and rivers for future generations

Water is essential to life. Families, communities, farms and businesses depend on access to clean and reliable fresh water. The ocean covers 70% of our planet, and ocean life is critical to much of the air we breathe and food we eat. And our overall health and well-being is directly linked to the health of our rivers and oceans. The conservation of our environment is a responsibility and a necessity, but it can't come at the expense of a family's livelihood.

The foundation's approach to conservation grantmaking has as much to do with the economy as it does the environment. We believe that bringing together conservation, business and community interests creates the long-term solutions that protect natural resources and build local economies.

For example, overfishing is one of the greatest, yet manageable, threats to ocean health. Following almost a decade of work in using sound science, markets and catch share programs to reform the way fisheries are managed, the United States is on track to end overfishing. We see hopeful signs for America's commercial and recreational fishermen and the communities that depend on fishing jobs, and intend to take the lessons learned to other parts of the world.

In the Mississippi River Basin, where the foundation promotes farming practices that protect drinking water while supporting agricultural economies, we have seen progress on 1 million acres of cropland over the last five years. These farming practices have been so successful that we are expanding our work with a goal of changing practices on 10 million acres over the next five years.

In the Colorado River Basin, we are building toward a future that has healthy rivers, riparian habitat and groundwater supplies for the benefit of the environment and communities alike. We support a water management system that rewards efficiency and enables enhanced flexibility. For example, in 2015, our grantees facilitated 10 demonstration projects to enable saved agricultural water to benefit river flows and enhance system resiliency.

While there is significant, tangible progress being made, there is still a great deal more work to do. Last year, we invested $79.8 million in conservation efforts, and over the next five years, we anticipate investing $455 million in the people and ideas that create the economic incentives to conserve our oceans and rivers – our most valuable, irreplaceable resources.

“Overfishing is one of the greatest threats to ocean health – which means it’s also threatening local economies and communities. This is a solvable problem.”

Ecotourism Protects Livelihoods and the Environment in Indonesia

Raja Ampat Local Homestay Association and Seventythree help sustain communities and protect ocean health

One of the most diverse marine ecosystems in the world, the Raja Ampat Islands, or the “Four Kings,” sits just to the northwest of Indonesia’s West Papua province at the tip of Bird’s Head Peninsula. But despite its natural beauty, the communities of Raja Ampat have long struggled to support their families and send their children to school. Now, many who turned to illegal fishing, timber and wildlife trading to put food on the table are adopting ecotourism as a new livelihood and a way to protect their islands for generations to come.

By developing homestays – simple tourist accommodations on plots of land their ancestors farmed – Raja Ampat communities are keeping control of the shores they have lived on for years. Through homestays, families can afford to work their own land, stave off commercial resorts and housing development, and be their own employers – safeguarding their cultural identity along the way.

For over three years, the Raja Ampat Local Homestay Association has not only been helping homestays thrive, but also connecting island economies, inspiring youth and empowering women to be community leaders. To date, homestays and the opportunities they create for fishermen and farmers to supply fresh produce have generated more than 600 local jobs across Raja Ampat and more than $1 million in revenue – a substantial sum for rural indigenous areas.

And homestays are not only regenerating Raja Ampat communities, they are also helping protect local marine health. Communities and families across the islands know their businesses depend on a healthy environment and are embracing conservation as a part of their journey to lift themselves out of poverty. “I was an illegal logger,” one homestay owner in the village of Sawinggrai explained. “Then I discovered this homestay business and my life changed completely. I now stand on the front line trying to defend our environment.”

To help ensure the Homestay Association and its more than 50 family-owned homestays continue to grow, Seventythree – with support from the Walton Family Foundation – provides business and management guidance to members. Through providing problem-solving and practical skills training, Seventythree is helping Raja Ampat communities create a new future. For some, like one homestay owner from the village Korbekwan, that future is already real. “This homestay has made it possible for me to send four of my children to college,” he explained. “If I had stuck to fishing only, that would never have been possible.”

Restoring the Escalante River One Mile at a Time

Environment

Keeping the river healthy for future generations through innovative partnerships

Free-flowing rivers that carve red rock canyons are a defining feature of the American West, and are a valuable resource for native fish, migratory birds, mammals large and small, and local communities. However, in Southern Utah, invasive species, drought and increased water use are threatening the health of the Escalante River and the people, plants and animals that depend on it.

Over the past 40 years, Russian olive trees – initially planted as wind breaks and decoration – have taken over, smothering the banks, sucking up water and disrupting the river’s flows. As Kristina Waggoner, Grand Staircase Escalante Partners (GSEP) field director and project coordinator of the Escalante River Watershed Partnership (ERWP) explains, the trees are now choking the river.

“In some places, they’re so thick that you can’t see the river, much less the other side,” Kristina said. So in 2009, with support from the Walton Family Foundation, GSEP teamed up with landowners, public and private agencies, scientists, local businesses and conservation groups to restore balance to the Escalante River. Halfway through its 10-year action plan, ERWP is steadily improving the health of the river, one mile at a time.

“We are just over two-thirds of the way done... the river is 90 miles long, and we have cleared out over 70 miles. Our goal is to finish by 2018,” Kristina said.

And while ERWP is restoring habitat for fish and wildlife, it’s helping local communities too. Restoration has spurred tourism and markets for products like coasters and cutting boards – locally made from the Russian olive trees that ERWP removes. Together, Escalante River residents are showing how innovative partnerships help keep the river and communities healthy for future generations. And as ERWP closes in on achieving its goal, Kristina is keeping the partnership’s future in mind.

“My hope is that we can sustain our energy as a coalition to continue to work together [in the area] as other needs arise,” she said.

For the Sake of the Soil, Farmers Look Beyond Soy and Corn

Iowa farmer Jon Bakehouse embraces cover crops

Just outside of Hastings, Iowa, Jon Bakehouse and his family run Maple Edge Farm – 700 acres of soy bean and corn cultivation. And while his family has been growing these cash crops for five generations, Jon’s starting to do things a little differently for the sake of the soil.

“I’ve read No-Till Farmer magazine for years and one day I came across an article about cover crops. The more I read about cover crops, the more and more interested I got.” But Jon was really sold after attending a presentation on cover crops by Practical Farmers of Iowa (PFI) at his neighbor’s shop. With support from the Walton Family Foundation, PFI helps farmers research, adopt and teach their peers about cover crops as a way to keep their soil and water systems healthy without hurting their bottom line. For about six years now, Jon’s been experimenting with cover crops – mainly cereal rye and alfalfa – as a way to keep nutrients in the soil and reduce the amount of fertilizer and weed killers he uses on the farm, both of which carry large price tags and can pollute local rivers and streams.

“What you see above ground reflects what’s going on under the ground and in the soil,” he explained.

He jokes that cover crops have had a gateway effect on him. “They’ve opened a whole new realm of things I want to try.” Now, Jon is working with PFI to test varieties of soy and corn that mature faster, allowing him to plant more diverse species of cover crops that require earlier planting.

While Jon admits that not all his experiments have been successful, he’s even more firm in his belief now than when he started that using cover crops is “the right thing to do.” As he sees it, life – from feeding people to protecting the Gulf of Mexico from harmful pollutants – depends on soil. “If we don’t take care of it, we’ll have lots of problems,” he said. “And cover crops can help now.”

Improving quality of life in Northwest Arkansas and the Delta

In our home region, we want to improve the quality of life and to create and sustain economic opportunities in the Arkansas communities that first gave Sam and Helen Walton opportunity.

In Northwest Arkansas, we've discovered that by creating a great place for locals, we've made a destination for visitors. The region was recently ranked among the top places to live by U.S. News & World Report, and it's clear there's a movement taking place in this corner of the world. From a new, upcoming independent school to an expanded culinary arts training program to the Northwest Arkansas Design Excellence Program – it's become an area that people are not only drawn to for a career, but because of the lifestyle and culture.

Last year, the Razorback Regional Greenway was completed, connecting our communities with 36 miles of multi-use trails. And we learned that our regional trail traffic is comparable to major bike- and pedestrian-friendly metropolitan cities.

In the Delta, we increased after-school programming options that offer families engaging curriculums and safe environments for their children.

The work in Northwest Arkansas and the Delta couldn't happen without the support of local communities. These partnerships are key to moving the needle and meeting the needs of those who live in our home region.

Discovery through Experience at Scott Family Amazeum

At the Tinkering Hub, everything is left to the imagination

It was the perfect visual to answer the question, “Why the Amazeum?” A five-year-old girl, wearing a long, flowing, pink princess dress and safety goggles, reaching up with a wrench to take apart the door frame of a minivan. The tools in her hands didn’t feel out of place at all. And the smiles on the faces of that little princess-turned-auto tinkerer and her parents were priceless.

That’s why I do what I do. It’s why so many individuals, families and donors came together to create the Amazeum – a venue intentionally designed to evoke a sense of curiosity and discovery through hands-on experiences – in Northwest Arkansas. That little girl, her family and the hundreds of others who dismantled that minivan down to its frame, did so as part of TinkerFest, an extension of the Amazeum’s wildly popular 3M Tinkering Hub. It’s all there in the Tinkering Hub – from packaging tape, scissors, paperclips and cardboard toilet paper rolls to hot glue guns, soldering irons, wires and power tools. The beauty of the Tinkering Hub is that absolutely everything is left to the imagination. Everyone walks in with a clean slate – and it’s amazing to see how that kind of environment brings people and families together.

The Tinkering Hub and the Amazeum, in general, is a place where kids get to see a different side of their parents – one where they struggle and experience completely new things. And parents see their kids take the lead. Families make memories – and, often times, unlock doors they’ve never opened before. When you come here, you’re the one in control of all the levers and switches. It’s your adventure. So, from providing a vehicle for families to grow closer together, to helping turn the wonder of science or math on for a child – that’s what ongoing support from organizations like the Walton Family Foundation translate into.

When we opened in July 2015, we projected 180,000 guests would pass through the Amazeum doors during its first year of operation. By February 2016, we had far surpassed that figure, four months ahead of schedule. There’s clearly a thirst for this kind of experience. And the community has embraced it with open arms.

The College Initiative creates a path between Delta students and college education

A few years ago, I struck up a conversation with a soon-to-be graduating high school senior in the Arkansas Delta about her plans for college. I found out college was one of the furthest things from her mind. She didn't see higher education as a realistic opportunity and wasn't sure what she'd do with her life.

Today, she's completing her sophomore year at Harvard University on scholarship. And with a 3.75 grade point average, she's not just making it. She's thriving and opening a world of opportunity that once seemed impossible. Stories like that are why, in 2012, I founded The College Initiative – a program designed to help college-capable high school students in the Arkansas Delta and Memphis with the tools and mentorship to successfully apply to and succeed in college.

As a high school teacher in Marianna, Ark. with the Teach For America program, my eyes were opened to the untapped potential in the Delta region. There were a lot of really bright kids, but very few of them had ever considered taking the ACT or SAT, let alone applying to college. So many students in underserved communities aren't thinking about the basic requirements, like GPA and extracurricular involvement, preparing for the ACT and SAT. Even fewer are thinking about what college or university would be right for them.

With the support of such organizations as the Walton Family Foundation, The College Initiative is arming students with the information and confidence they need. Over the past three years, every high school senior we've worked with has been accepted into colleges and universities. Through our focus on college planning and preparation, students have averaged a four-point increase on their ACT scores and earned a combined $10 million in scholarships. With a goal of serving 5,000 students over the next three to five years, we're just getting started.

Changing Perceptions and Futures through Preparation

By Gabriel Fotsing, founder and CEO, The College Initiative

Strengthening the Downtown Pulse

By Greg Hines, mayor, City of Rogers, Arkansas

Lake Atalanta transformation accelerates revitalization in downtown Rogers, Arkansas

As a lifelong resident of Rogers, Arkansas, it's nearly impossible to reminisce without Lake Atlanta prominently finding its way into the conversation.

It was the gathering place. Every wedding rehearsal dinner in town was at Lakeside Restaurant. My first experience on a paddleboat, the day I overcame my fear of leaping off the high dive, and so many of my fondest childhood memories took place at Lake Atalanta.

Everyone recognizes the lake was an incredibly valuable asset, but the key word there is "was." We watched one of our greatest assets go dormant. But this community and supporting organizations like the Walton Family Foundation have come together to invest in bringing the pulse back to Lake Atalanta. You're going to be able to spend a whole day in and around the lake, yet be within walking distance from the restaurants and other amenities of our downtown. What this investment means to long-term opportunity for downtown Rogers and the identity of the entire community is immeasurable.

Over the past six years, we've gone from conception, to design, to the dream physically coming alive. Two additional parcels of land were acquired, nearly doubling the lake area to 236 acres. We've eliminated the dilapidated structures that blocked the view of Lake Atalanta, and major investment has been pumped into restoring its connection to downtown Rogers. We've been intentional about removing the man-made structures and respecting the natural beauty that's always been in our own back yard.

The old road around the lake is being transformed into a scenic hard-surface trail. Ten miles of additional natural-surface trails are being cut, and we've designated a bird sanctuary area and dog parks. Pavilions have been reconstructed and shallow creek beds have been opened up into deep pools. Even the old swing sets have been replaced with play areas built right into the rolling topography of the area. From road improvements to connections to the Razorback Regional Greenway trail system, we're establishing much-needed accessibility.

The physical work began in January 2012, and the community is eagerly awaiting the reopening of Lake Atalanta Park in late summer or early fall of 2016.

Our downtown has reinvented itself a number of times, but we were challenged to think bigger. What we have now is a plan with identity – a plan that’s sustainable. We’re creating an environment that’s attractive to residential and business development and redevelopment, and that elevates the potential for our historic downtown.

Lake Atalanta is the secret sauce that has all of those wheels turning again. This is what community is all about.
